

Nellie Brown Thornton

July 31, 1934 - January 19, 2025

Nellie Mae Brown was born on July 31, 1934 to Annie Bell Brown, the daughter of Ollie Brown and Fed Brown of Jackson, Georgia. Fed Brown was a bootlegger under the employ of the county sheriff and as legend has it, a bit of an underground railroad conductor. More on that story later. Her father, Willie James Crawford, was a young sharecropper by day and bootlegger by night from Indian Springs, Georgia. The next 90 years for Nellie were filled with both tragedy and adventure.

Tragedy struck Nellie through social injustice at the age of eight when her mother was taken away and sentenced to life in prison while pregnant with her youngest child. Although that sentence was commuted eight years later, it left Nellie without a mother during her most formative years. Even post prison, her mother continued to be absent from the community and Nellie's life for a number of years. This kind of trauma continues to survive for generations.

Nellie was left to be raised by her grandparents and other extended family. As the oldest child, she felt the heavy burden of protecting and caring for her three younger siblings without the protective apron of a mother. Growing up "in town" instead of "in the country," Nellie often worked as a domestic at a very young age, being forced to grow up way too fast.

Nellie watched her grandmother Ollie pack huge sacks of food for her grandfather Fed as he disappeared into the night for weeks at a time. She later came to understand that her grandfather was a guide who escorted black men north, hobbing on freight trains to avoid eminent lynching. This was the birth of Nellie's interest in social activism.

Although opportunities were limited, Nellie loved sports, especially basketball. This is a gift that she ultimately passed to her children and grandchildren. She was blessed with an opportunity to play for a brief time while at the colored high school in Jackson, Georgia. This opportunity was interrupted as Nellie became a single mother at age fifteen.

In the mid-1950s, Nellie met Willie Morris Thornton, a young Korean War veteran from Locust Grove, Georgia. Willie Morris was a highly intelligent and industrious young man who suffered from what we now know to be post-traumatic stress syndrome from the horrendous atrocities he experienced during the Korean War. They went on to marry in 1956 and began their lives back in Locust Grove, Georgia as what we now call a "blended family."

In 1961, Nellie and Willie Morris became the first young black family of their generation to build a new home in the town of Locust Grove, just a "stone's throw" from Shoal Creek Baptist Church where Willie Morris' grandfather, Robert "Bob" Colvin, was one of the early leaders in the late 1800's. Nellie and Willie Morris went on to become pillars of both the Shoal Creek Baptist Church and the community at large.

Nellie's love for sports and her children led her to become a youth baseball organizer and manager. This was unheard of for a woman in the late 1960s. She was an avid reader who believed that education was a virtue. Nellie also loved flower gardening and baking. Cakes were her specialty: Chocolate, German Chocolate, Caramel, Pineapple, Coconut and Red Velvet. Her cooking was so renowned, that Deacon Willie Morris would end up "running the preachers off” when the Thorntons hosted the Pastor for dinner on Second Sundays because they were eating too much food! Nellie even cooked for visiting former pastor Rev. Martin Luther King Sr.

Nellie loved music and loved to dance. She had a core group of friends and was loyal to a fault. Nellie was a bit of a fashionista who was always conscious of her image and appearance. Some might call her “proper.”

Like many black women of her generation, she was always a working mom. She started as a domestic, worked as a school cafeteria cook and then a factory worker. Her young children would be so excited when she brought home used clothing from the “white folks” house. Nellie was most proud of her work as a special education assistant for the Henry County Board of Education in the late 1970’s. One of her greatest accomplishments was organizing and working on the Special Olympics for the special needs children of Henry County.

In the 1980’s Nellie moved to Atlanta to be with her ailing mother. Blessed with the gift of gab, she never met a stranger. Nellie became a greeter at one of Kroger’s Citi Center concept stores in the West End, where she was adored. In 1987, Nellie participated in Rev Hosea Williams’ Civil Rights March in Forsyth County Georgia, protesting the county’s status as a “sundown county,” no black people allowed after dark. This legacy of activism and standing up for the underdog continues to live on in her children. Nellie later spent many years traveling with her friend Herman Pittman. She certainly had a zest for life.

She spent the final years of her life living with her daughter Wander before succumbing to dementia and moving to a nursing home in 2020. As always, Nellie was the “Queen of the Ball” at the Medical Management Health & Rehab nursing home in Macon, GA. She died peacefully in her sleep on Sunday morning, January 19th, 2025.

Nellie was preceded in death by her former husband Deacon Willie Morris Thornton Sr, her son Harry "Skeet" Thornton, her grandson Ryan Thornton, her brothers Andre Brooks & John Marvin Brooks and her sister Christine McElhaney Folds. She is survived by her children Delores Thornton Baxter, Dr. W M "Billy" Thornton Jr (Meril), Johnny Thornton (Angela), Wander Thornton, foster daughter Pauline Ponder Gaston and her sister Catherine Brooks Douglas. She is also survived by her grandchildren Starr Baxter, Andrea Thornton Bolden (Earl), Marcus Thornton, Isaiah Thornton and great grandchild Jayden Thornton.
